Mouse Speeder: change mouse sensitivity with the press of a key [free] You've just bought yourself a new and sleek new desktop. You've cleaned up all the clutter and installed some wallpaper to liven up your new space. And because you're such an organized individual, you've transferred all of your documents, videos, photos and music onto your new drive. But the big question that's taking up space in your head is: Is this desktop drive working for you? If your desktop computer isn't running well, you could be consuming valuable time by going to System Restore. But until you can work out what's wrong with your PC, it might not be the best use of your time. Go to the Control Panel and then choose Create a restore point to see what happens when you do this. If the computer runs smoothly, then you can proceed to use System Restore to restore your computer to a previous state. If you have any problems, you can always do a fresh install of Windows. You don't need to uninstall your hardware drivers and install them again. Although it is sometimes helpful to reinstall your drivers, it usually isn't necessary if you've been using the previous version of the driver. The C-Drive and the A-Drive are part of the operating system and they are saved in the Windows Registry and in the system folder. The drive letters can be changed as needed. It is possible to format the wrong drive - accidentally or by mis-click. The most likely scenario, is that the operating system sees that the drive is full. It is possible to create the Operating System on a separate drive, but then Windows will need to be reinstalled. I was always under the impression that the A-Drive was just an external drive, that is attached to the PC's motherboard via an interface adapter. To find the hidden drive: Press the Windows key + R to open the Start page. Type regedit in the text box. Hit Enter. Locate HKEY_LOCAL_MACHINE\SYSTEM\CurrentControlSet\Control\StorageDevicePolicies\ Click the right mouse button and select New. Type Disk1 in the drop down box. Change the Flags field to 512. Click OK three times to confirm the changes. Double click the Disk2 link in the tree and set its Flags field to 512. Click b7e8fdf5c8
